Farewell, job title. Hello, skill set

Job titles are out, skill sets are in

But despite all this swift change, we continue to measure workforce supply and demand in an archaic manner - via the supply and demand of job titles. This method isn't ideal because job titles can mean different things in different industries and geographies. At LinkedIn, we view job titles as an agglomeration of skills (for example, a journalist's skills include writing, editing, communication, and critical thinking, to name a few), and we believe the best way to measure workforce supply and demand is by analyzing workers' skills and the skills needed to qualify for open jobs.

In the Human Capital Report, we provide several examples that illustrate the insights that are are uncovered when you analyze supply and demand of skills, rather than job titles. To see them all, you'll have to check out the report. But in this blog post, I'll drill down on one particularly interesting example.
